LEARNING OUTCOMES AND RESEARCH TOPICS	The PhD programme aims at fostering theoretical and methodological skills required for high-level research. It is subdivided into three different curricula. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The “Philosophy and History of Concepts” curriculum deals with problems and methodologies of theoretical research, with reference to rationality models that hark back to the tradition. It also addresses knowledge conservation and transmission processes through the circulation of ideas, against the backdrop of philosophical doctrines, scientific theories, artistic and cultural experiences, social and political practices. 2. The “Logic and Epistemology” curriculum centres about logic, the foundations and formal analysis of the deductive, natural and human sciences, and communication of scientific contents. Issues related to information theory and artificial intelligence (big data & machine learning) will be especially taken into account. 3. The “Education and Psychology” curriculum addresses on the one hand the historical and theoretical-foundational aspects of pedagogy, didactics and educational research; on the other, social, developmental and clinical psychology in a life-span perspective. Typical and atypical mental processes (motivation, attachment and intersubjectivity, meta-representation, theory of mind, language) will be investigated, promoting a development of inclusion and diversity in educational and community contexts. The PhD programme prepares students for job opportunities at universities, public or private institutes; in particular, high-impact theoretical or applied research, information processing, knowledge dissemination, planning in educational, clinical and community contexts (including diversity and inclusion). The training is based on horizontal and interdisciplinary aimed at a critical approach to problem

	solving. The PhD programme is mainly devoted to high level research, applicable in such fields as IT, data analysis, complex phenomena, human resource management, design and evaluation of development interventions for the development of individual and collective potential.
