LEARNING OUTCOMES AND RESEARCH TOPICS	The PhD programme in History, Cultural Heritage and International Studies of the University of Cagliari aims to train highly qualified scholars within the studies of History, considered in its multiple facets and meant as a process of knowledge of the past which provides useful insights into the current world, into the spatial and territorial conditions and the dynamics regulating its social functioning also from an international perspective. In the framework of its primary interests and educational process, the PhD combines History in its periods (ancient, medieval, modern, etc.), Cultural heritage in its broader sense (archaeological, artistic, cinematic, musical), with a focus on Sardinian history and cultural heritage, aiming at the development of the territory and the enhancement of international relations, and International and Area Studies, especially on field research about Asia, Middle East, Africa and the political relations at a global scale. In the framework of this general organisation, the PhD is subdivided into three curricula (International and Area Studies. History. Spaces. Society; Euro Mediterranean Historical Studies from the ancient times to the contemporary age; Archaeological and Artistic Heritage, Film and Music Studies), which encourage the candidates to nurture, within the History guidelines, specific and original research directions with a multidisciplinary and comparative approach. Teaching is thus structured in several educational stages offering a basic research methodology in humanities, with a focus on the historical and historiographical approach, through a synchronic perspective which enables to observe the events in the context which has actually produced them and where they have occurred, and a diachronic perspective which favours the connections between different eras and geo-cultural areas, also from an interdisciplinary perspective. Thanks to participation in the lectures and seminars provided in the training course, the doctoral student will acquire a series of methodologies applied to research in the humanities, history, cultural heritage, geography. With these aims he will participate in European and extra-European foreign language courses, aimed at improving the knowledge already acquired at the time of the competition and at learning one or more new languages; he will also participate in computer science courses applied to research topics, through which he will acquire the knowledge and skills of using the most up-to-date software in use, computerized data processing systems, database management for the purpose of their application in the fields archaeology, art history, music and cinema, history, geography, in the regional field, but with a perspective of national and international interaction. In the first year, doctoral students will acquire a research method and skills that ensure full autonomy within the chosen field, skills that will be expanded and completed in the next year, in which the doctoral students will complete their study and research paths.
